People with dementia become increasingly aware of their situation and are more often in need of special care. The caregivers and institutions often suffer from lack of knowledge on how the physical and psychological state of the person with dementia is deteriorating. The aim of the study is to compare sleep quality of people with Alzheimer's disease (AD) in terms of dementia severity using the sleep diary, to document the sleep quality of their carers, and to analyse the effect of a sleep diary on the level of objectification of the person with AD. The participants in the study were 44 people with AD, 58 of their carers, and 29 healthy controls. The baseline assessment was performed using standardised assessments. The sleep diary was administered for 7 consecutive nights. The level of objectification was examined by the carers with the 'Identification of Touch (IDT)' scale. In all participants sleep latency was prolonged as dementia severity increased, whereas sleep duration was not significantly affected. The carers spent more time on caregiving when the person with AD was more severely demented, and they felt closer to the person when the dementia was more severe. The total IDT score was higher for both the carers and people with AD. For the carers and people with AD the sleep diary was an effective method to collect subjective data on 2edc1e01e8
