With the new Photoshop, I do notice a modest shift in the workflow from the original interface. Overall, however, the look and feel is still visually appealing. I do not think that I prefer it, though. I appreciate the eye for detail and all the additional features that promise to impress. I am also not crazy about the way Apple chose to use the numerous pane icons. I would have preferred to see the standard Adobe CS6 desktop icons and a host of custom apps from Adobe, as well as some familiar elements from Adobe Creative Cloud. Apple already has icons for course materials and artboards—why not branding, too? But being the biggest computer company in the world, Apple is using Macs and iPhones, and I think we can all live without the standard Adobe icons. However, I do appreciate Apple's attempt to make the user interface more logical. Same with the default interface icons. Apple also learned its lesson in the 1990s and has moved to a differentiated, cohesive look. Pecking away a problem can lead to an infected streak all over the screen! Thankfully, it still has many those annoying clever but useless features that we have to tolerate in any other Apple OS. I can't see why users would want to downgrade to earlier versions. Of course, they can find the older dialog boxes that bear a distinct resemblance to the ones that are in Lightroom 5. Still, I believe that they will not need that to operate images with this release of Adobe Photoshop. I can also understand the appeal of the upgraded features that the new Photoshop apps have to offer. Now that Photoshop has introduced graphic design apps for Mac and Windows, and even the best-selling iOS iPad, it is time to reap the benefits of this.

To add an individual photo, click the plus sign next to the image size (width and height are shown) that you wish to use. If you're creating a template, you'll first be asked to decide what size it should be. The size can be monochromatic or full-color.
