As a premium user, Adobe is asking you for your privacy. What I like about this is that it eliminates the need to worry about protecting files from other users ever again. I think that it should be a standard, but it should be optional, and it should come with the other default features like tags, layers and the like. Offering this feature as a premium only option is a good idea, because it would give those who use the premium plan for personal content (as opposed to commercial) the ability to have their files securely stored without having to worry about those files getting in the hands of non-advertisers. I have been concerned about these changes. My husband is disabled and photography is something I love to do for us. He has tried to use the functions now that are disabled and seems to be confused. I'm glad to see something that will ease his work! Hi Barbara, thanks for chatting with the Photoshop Community on the Photoshop team forums. I'm glad you're enjoying the update. Of course, special characters can still be used in file names, and the new file format is designed to accommodate that, so hopefully you'll only have to worry about it for a few months. That being said, the fact that you found a bug in how the 2018 updates are installed means that we can track that down now and will have it fixed in our installer. Hopefully, the fixes will get back to you when you update your copy today. I've had to say goodbye to Adobe Photo Shop for the moment and will try this new version with test images.

I like it very much, refresh rate is very quick and I can erase smaller objects and there is already a selection tool where I can quite easily delete unwanted objects using the blur tool. All in all, I like it much, for fuller documentation about the new version I am looking forward to the help of all the online reviewers. Thx.

It's All About The Looks: Photoshop's Looks panel lets you adjust the way your image appears. Most of these are on the Images panel, where you'll find tools to deal with color and other settings; we'll get to those tools shortly. Once you have the adjustments you want made, you need to convert them into selections. In Lightroom, this is easy:

- Select the layer you want the adjustment applied to
- Go to Edit > Create > Selection

Choose Refine Edge, and Lightroom will automatically create a selection of the highlights and shadows for you, and give you the option to make the selection global or specific to a specific area. Refine Edge also enables you to add the exact changes you want to your image. Processing and saving

- Once you have the selection you want, you can hold down "Ctrl" and drag the color swatch icon in the top right of the image viewer window to make color swatches for the highlights, shadows, midtones, and so on. Over time you'll just use this color swatch palette to select the exact replacements and colors you want in your highlights, shadows, midtones, etc.

Bottom line: Lightroom is perfect for raw photos, digital negatives, and various other raw files. Digital negatives are document files saved in the.NEF format. For many, they're the original files the photo was taken on and when it comes to working with that sort of detail, Lightroom works miracles. There's not much difference between Lightroom and Photoshop in how to use them - they're both great. They're also the go-to program for many people who shoot on the Mac. e3d0a04c9c
